Having for a long time suffered from the effects of a horrible blood trouble, and after resorting to medical skill and other remedies without benefit, I tried "A. B. C. Alterative." I have been entirely restored, and it affords me pleasure to attest its efficacy. It is evidently a very great tonic and alterative, and I recommend any suffering from blood trouble, to try it.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

To Hoard and Store is the Reverse of Wisdom and Generosity.

True economy does not lie in overmuch saving. The thrift that fills attics and closets and store rooms with cast-off clothing, dislocated furniture, odds and ends of stuff of all variety is not economy at all, but extravagance and waste. The only mission of things in this transitory world is to be of service to the people, and the power of rendering service depends on conditions. It is wasteful and useless for the city woman, whose gowns are all made by a fashionable and expensive modiste, to put by half-worn dresses with a view to their being made over again. The expense of their being ripped apart, pressed or cleaned, and sufficiently freshened to be available in a combination with new material, will quite equal that of getting new goods to begin with, to say nothing of the trouble involved. At the same time such dresses given to women who do the work for themselves will hold some value, and that is the truly wise economy which places things where they will do somebody some good. There is a very wide gulf fixed between this careful and thoughtful attention to details, seeing that nothing is really wasted, but goes where it can be of some service to some one, and meanness or niggardness. Lydia Maria Child, who sometimes wrote to her friends on the backs of old envelopes, was never unable nor unwilling to assist those who needed assistance. As Emerson said of Alcott, "He was rich because he was always able to help some one poorer than himself." It is a very easy matter for the wealthy woman to subscribe generously on public subscription lists, and costs far less than does often the continued and perpetual thoughtfulness of the poor woman who is unable to ever give any thing of special significance at any one time, but who, nevertheless, meets many daily needs of those immediately about her. A lady whose large possessions and generous thoughtfulness seems almost equal, remarked recently that she had not a store-room in her house; every scrap and object of any kind left over in her household, from clothing to furniture, or kitchen utensils, was at once placed where it would do some one some good. A chair or couch grown too shabby for her beautiful rooms was given to the family whom it would well serve, and where skillful fingers could repair or renew it and make it a valuable adjunct to the furniture. So with household linen, dishes and a thousand things all the time accumulating in an elaborate and luxurious house. Here was true and wise economy. There are hundreds of households where attics and store-rooms are crowded with things that are of no earthly use, or will ever be to the possessors, which attract moths and insects, and are the burden of the semi-annual house cleanings; but which, if they had been given away at their freshest and best, might easily have served some purpose well. To hoard and store is the reverse of true economy.—Boston Budget.

Plain Living the Healthiest.

The question is asked why animals are able to eat almost constantly and yet enjoy good health while, it is claimed that human beings must eat only at certain hours if they are to maintain health. If digestion were with us as with the animals, the main business of life, doubtless we might concentrate all our energies upon our stomachs and keep them filled the most of the time, and still continue in fair health. The lower animals have greater digestive vigor and less mental ability. As some one says: "An animal is a stomach with other organs appended." Wild animals have no hard work and few annoyances. Take an animal and worry it as many a poor mother or business man is worried, and it would not live a week. If we undertake to do brain-work and muscle-work and at the same time give our stomachs no rest, there will surely be physical failure in some direction after a time. If we want to do the most and the best work, "plain living and high thinking" must be our rule.—From a Lecture by J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek Sanitarium.

The Jews in Russia.

The Xovoe Vremya confirms the statement which it made some days ago with regard to a further limitation of the civil rights of the Jews. The paper now says that the new regulations are being elaborated at the Ministry of Finance and will apply to all Jews inhabiting the north and southwestern and the Vistula provinces. The exact nature of the new limitations is not yet made public. The police departments have been instructed to enforce the operation of paragraph 957 of the ninth volume of the Russian code, under which it is permitted to Russian Jewish students having completed their courses at the Lyceum to enter any university in the Empire for which they may be eligible, but upon leaving the university they are compelled to return to their native towns under certain penalties and disabilities. When a Jewish student fails to conform to this exacting and oppressive regulation and eludes the vigilance of the police, his parents, if living, are held responsible.—Odessa Letter.
